	In the past, talking about the definition or protection of human rights was no more than an idealized utopia. With the creation of the United Nations we witnessed a truly internationalisation of these rights. The protection of human rights, along with the maintenance of international peace and security, is one of the Organisation's mains objectives. The problem of the Charter was that it did not mention protection of human rights but promotion. Therefore, in 1946, the Economic and Social Council created the Commission on Human Rights, a subsidiary body that would perform an important role in the field of human rights. However, it was criticized during its last years due to its double standards and excessive politization. This resulted in its replacement by the Human Rights Council.
