	The European Union and its Common Foreign and Security Policy is an area in constant development. Throughout the EU Constitutive Treaties, the CFSP has been a remarkable project since today it continues to be part of the pillar of cooperation. As consequence, its development has been slow, as demonstrates the numerous EU Treaties that have developed the subject. Likewise, it has been a difficult process since, on numerous occasions, the proposals issued in this area have not reached a successful conclusion. The Treaty of Lisbon, besides being the last one, was a great step in this matter that incorporates numerous novelties worthy of being analyzed. Also, as many years have passed since its entry into force, it is possible to analyze the results obtained. And on the other hand, make an assessment on how everything done so far can influence its future. For these reasons, present study analyzes the importance of the Lisbon Treaty on CFSP matters and the new features that were incorporated. Also, it will study the results obtained and assess how these results influence on the CFSP development.
